Includes 1927/28-57, Report of the Forest Products Research Board; and 1959- Report of the Forest Products Research Laboratory Steering Committee. Forests in the United States contain a significant amount of small-diameter and underutilized material. These overstocked stands not only increase the risk of insect, disease, fire, and drought damage, but also are costly to remove. Finding economical and marketable uses for small-diameter and underutilized material would alleviate these problems while improving watershed health and providing economic opportunities for local communities to help offset forest management costs. An extensive research program at the Forest Products Laboratory of the USDA Forest Service is focused on searching for economical and marketable uses for small-diameter material. The projects described in this report range from conserving timber through improving sawing technology to developing businesses for using small-diameter material. This report contains speeches made at the general assembly and banquet of the Forest Products Laboratory's 75th Anniversary celebration on June 4, 1985. It highlights the significance of the Laboratory and presents the speakers' view of the future for forestry and wood products research.
